BARNARD GIRLS IN BASEBALL TRYOUT

Candidates Report for Practice To-morrow.

WITH THE GIANTS.

Special to THE SUN AND NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, March 27.—It is understood that the Giants have obtained waivers on Emmett Bowen, who came to the club with Stantz from Holy Cross College last summer. At that time Bowen was credited the greater player. The New York club wants to farm Bowen out to Rochester, after waiving the Red Sox decided they wanted the outfielder. They have made McGraw an offer for Bowen, but we doubt if he will let him go.

Bill Lamar, former Yankee, who was traded by the Red Sox to Louisville for Hendry, refuses to report to the Colonians, and very likely will be obtained by the Braves.

Yesterday's game was the first of the series in which neither side was able to make any extra base hits. The previous encounters had been with long clouts. The pitchers are getting down to real work.

Bill Klem, who joined the club Thursday, umpired his first game behind the bat yesterday. He introduced each batsman before he came to the plate for the first time. His style made a big hit. It was, "The next batsman is shortstop and captain, Mr. Arthur Fletcher." Bill went along in fine shape until he came to Marsans. Then he muffed the Armando.

Contenders Come Through Successfully at Tennis

William T. Tilden, 2d; Samuel Hardy, Frank T. Anderson, S. Howard Voshell and Vincent Richards Triumph in National Indoor Tourney.

All the recognized contenders came through successfully in the opening of the national indoor tennis championship at the Seventh Regiment Army Y. yesterday, although two of them, Frank T. Anderson and Samuel Hardy, were excluded in the early half of their matches.

William T. Tilden, 2d, who is generally favored to win the title, triumphed in two matches without calling on anything but his best speed, and so did S. Howard Voshell, the champion of 1917 and 1918. Vincent Richards, the youthful holder of the title, drew a bye in the first round, took the second round match by default.

After a seven hour session of continuous play that began at 10 o'clock in the morning only thirty-two of the original seventy-two contestants remained. Of the successful contestants two, William T. Tilden and Stephen V. Robbins, had advanced as far as the fourth round of the tournament, in each case as a result of two victories and a bye. Of spectacular play there were matches aplenty. At times three or four matches of particular importance were going on simultaneously, and it was difficult for the gallery to choose between them.

The match that stood out as the most sparkling of the day and the one that was watched with greatest interest was that between Tilden and Robbins. Frank T. Anderson, the Seventh Regiment champion, and William Rosenbaum, who was runner up in the indoor championship of 1914, Anderson, on the strength of his unbeatable tennis during the indoor season, was regarded as a sure winner when play began, but he ran into all sorts of trouble right from the start. He was overzealous and far too hasty in his returns, and his judgment of distance suffered as a result. He kept driving into the net or out of bounds, and Rosenbaum, who was strong, as well as that stage, quickly ran into a lead of 3 to 0 in games.

Try as he would young Anderson could not recover control for the rest of the set. He was making a spectacular rally, however, for he was taking all kinds of chances with his hard low drives and was forcing the net at every opportunity. Rosenbaum was also trying for the position in the forward court. There was a series of volleying exchanges that had the crowd roused to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

Rosenbaum took the set at 6-3 and a change appeared to be certain, with Anderson the victim. With the opening of the second set, however, the Seventh Regiment champion showed a complete reversal. He played as though the first set was over, and by the time the completion of that division of play had given him renewed confidence. He continued to hit hard and to force the paces at top speed, but unlike his exhibition in the first set, everything he tried, no matter how bold a shot, went through successfully. Anderson was putting so much strength into his drive and was rushing up to the net so swiftly that Rosenbaum was unwilling to force the defensive. He had to remain there, too, for the rest of the match, for Anderson's play grew more brilliant as the match advanced.

So marked was Anderson's superiority in the second and third sets of the match that his opponent failed to win more than two games while the Seventh Regiment player was placing twelve to his credit. Rosenbaum hobbled up with a number of rallies toward the close of the match, but Anderson's speed and superior control proved too much for him. No better tennis was shown by the second player during the day than that of Anderson's in the last two sets of his match. His game was versatile, confident and dynamic in the force of its attack.

Voshell held the courts during the morning period of play, when the light was not as favorable as later in the day. His severe, sharp breaking service, always a difficult shot to return accurately, was doubly effective because of the conditions, and he took full advantage of it. Albert J. Ostendorf, the first round opponent, was completely outplayed by the service and half the time he failed to get his racket on the ball. Voshell also was coming up to the net and smothering Ostendorf's returns with unerring volleys. He was so remarkably accurate that the best of the first set, however, he took two points in the first five games. Voshell drew away the sixth game intentionally, driving the ball far out of bounds. He seemed loath to make it a love set.

In the second set, however, he took six games in a row, yielding only three points to his opponent, who throughout the match was outscored 50 points to 9. George O. Moore of the Yale team, who was runner up in the indoor championship, showed a far more impressive showing against Voshell in the second round. He handled Voshell's service remarkably well and his steady rally kept him in the running throughout the set. Voshell was unable to win more than one game.

It took Samuel Hardy, the California veteran, the greater part of the first set to solve the hard hitting style of Leonard Rogers and to get accustomed to the rather poor light during the morning, but after a narrow escape in the first set, which went to seven games, 7-5, Hardy brought all his court craft into play and defeated Rogers 6-2. Emerson made some brilliant strokes and played an aggressive game at the net, but his opponent was too faithful and too steady for him.
